It's Remodeling and Design Season for Your Office

The start of spring and home improvement projects go hand-in-hand. Why not move some of that spirit to your office as well with a new, fresh interior design?

Great River Office Products offers office interior design far beyond just helping you choose furniture. Our design team (meet them here), have many years of experience helping businesses design spaces that are efficient and on brand point.

When designing an office, keys things to consider include:

- * Budget
- * Space limitations
- * Comfort of those working in the space
- * Workflow efficiencies
- * Color and brand style of the business
- * Office furniture and the function of it
- * Sound and how it travels and affects everyone within the office
- * Lighting
- * Use of common space
- * The first impression - how well does the space fit your brand

You and your employees spend a significant amount of time at the office. You want the space to feel great and work effectively for everyone.

Choosing the Right Color for Your Workspace

As an employer, you are probably searching for a color that will make your office productive. If you Google this concept, the most common return you'll find is that blue is the most productive color for an office. However, that doesn't answer anything about what shade of blue might be best. It also says nothing about whether you and your employees will like the new color. Choosing color is a big task.

Colors can also be soothing for an office that may have conflict or energizing for a space that needs a little pick-me-up. Angela Wright, a world-renown color psychologist who has developed a scientifically-tested theory of color named the color affects system states, "Color does affect mood and productivity. The four psychological primaries are: red, blue, yellow, and green. And they affect the body (red), the mind (blue), the emotions, the ego, and self-confidence (yellow), and the essential balance between the mind, the body, and the emotions (green)." She goes on to say, "when you combine more than one color, you get the effects of both".

No wonder choosing color can be difficult. It can affect people in many ways. Ultimately, the color you choose for your office space needs to feel good to you and those who work there. Our office interior design team has the expertise you're looking for when designing your office. That includes choosing the right colors to fit your office, your style, and your brand.
